Good Silage in Silos of All Materials.

One of the questions that comes up when a new silo is to be purchased or built is whether the material used in the construction of the silo has any influence on the quality of the silage. The Missouri Experiment Station has been studying this problem for two years. Samples of silage were taken at the wall and at the center in silos of the stave, iron, Gurler, and concrete types. These samples were analyzed and the results compared. The results are given in detail in Research Bulletin 22 recently issued. The results of the analyses showed no difference in any way between the silage from the different types. No one should be persuaded to base the selection of the silo to be used upon the statement or supposition that one type of silo makes better silage than another. Any silo that has a tight wall that keeps out the air and is strong enough to withstand the pressure will preserve silage.

If the corn has sufficient moisture when put into the silo the only thing that can interfere with the making of good silage is the admission of air as the result of a poorly built silo or insufficient packing at the time of filling.—C. H. Eckles, Missouri Agricultural Experiment Station.

A Better "Bee-Cutting."

The usual bee-tree party simply robs the tree late in the fall and leaves a helpless but useful swarm to starve to death. It is much better to have the "bee-cutting" much earlier in the season when the swarm may be transferred to a good hive, moved home, and allowed to store enough honey to keep itself through the winter. If there is not a favorable fall for honey gathering, it may be necessary to feed this swarm through the first winter, but a good swarm is well worth it.

Students at the Missouri College of Agriculture were recently shown how to do this. They were equipped with an ax, a saw, a few bee-veils, a good hive, and a basket of tools. The basket contained a few feathers, a buggy-spring hive tool, a putty knife, two butcher knives, a few slender wood splints, and a smoker.

After the tree was cut the boys sawed into the trunk just below the knot-hole used by the bees as an entrance and made another cut about eight feet above the first one and a third cut about half way between these two. The bees were then transferred to the hive and the hive moved to its permanent location in accordance with directions found in Experiment Station Bulletin 138, entitled Farm Bee-Keeping.—L. Haseman, Missouri Agricultural Experiment Station.

An advance man of John Robinson's Ten Big Shows, which on the afternoon and evening of Thursday, August 10, will appear in Lexington, was seated in the lobby of a local hotel. He was telling a group of traveling men of some of the funny things he has seen while working with circuses.

"One of the ludicrous episodes I ever witnessed," said the showman; "came under my observation in a little Michigan town. It was just before the matinee performance. The day was unusually warm and pleasant and the show lot was crowded. I was on my way around the big tent from the performers' tent to the ticket wagon. As I neared the latter object I happened to glance in the direction of a group of canvasmen who were moving a cage. The tongue of the cage had a sort of crook at the end, similar to the bend in a shepherd's rod, and, in some manner, the tongue slipped and the crooked end was thrust right between the legs of a fellow of about forty years of age, who was standing with his back to the cage. Hastily glancing down at the crooked tongue end, the man bounded about four feet in the air, cried out, Help! Help! The elephant's got me! The elephant's got me! The elephant's got me and started wildly to run away. Instantly every observant bystander gave the man the merry ha, ha, and, after he had put several yards between himself and the elephant (?) he looked over his shoulder, saw that the pachyderm was none other than a big wagon toge and slunk away into the crowd which surrounded the main entrance.
